On Friday afternoon, the chief executive of the country's largest classified advertising company, online ad network Admeld, told his employees that the company was being forced to file for bankruptcy. Admeld's financial troubles had begun in March, when it lost its top-level advertising partnership, the Ad.ly service, to UnitedAds, an online marketing giant owned by the main wireless provider in the country, GSM Cellular. In the six months since, Admeld has cut its workforce by a third, from approximately 100 to around 60, and it has suffered growing losses. Last week, a group of creditors sued the company, alleging that it had not been paying its taxes as required by the Guatemalan government. In a statement on Friday, the company said that it had settled those claims, and that it was arranging “commercially reasonable financing.” What’s more, the company also said that it would be laying off a large portion of its workforce, and it laid out a number of plans for its site: the company intends to focus on local markets, and on trying to buy back its customers’ Ad.ly accounts so that they can keep running their old ads. Admeld will continue to process ad reservations through December, and it has an agreement with LN Communications, an advertising agency, to take over the company’s customer base by January. Admeld has been in the news because it was the third-largest advertiser on Facebook, but it was also one of the most unscrupulous companies in the industry. It was founded in 1996, and it raised a series of venture capital funds and bought up smaller competitors. It was briefly a publicly traded company in the mid-2000s, but then went through a series of questionable financing deals. It was a major advertiser on Facebook and then, in 2011, began using questionable financial tactics to secure contracts with Facebook advertisers.Q: Applying 'apply' to nested data frames in a list I have a nested list of data frames: library(tidyverse) set.seed(1234) data1 82157476af
